product .Q: Bearing in a 3d space I'm trying to find the rotational behavior of a rigid body. We assume that this rigid body is represented as a triangle.
From this triangle, we can compute a point on the centre of mass. I'm trying to compute the other three points of the triangle so that it should look like this: This is my problem, at the moment, I have computed the distance to the centre of mass and rotated my triangle to the direction of the line of the bearing. However, when the bearing is not constant, the triangle looks like this: The first picture shows what I'm trying to achieve, but the second picture is the result of the operations. There must be a formula to find the position of these points, but I don't know where to look. A: OK, so you have a triangle, which you want to have the blue line from C_m to C perpendicular to the plane of the triangle. First, let's try to figure out where this line should be if the triangle is not constrained in any way
